Robert Lam, Butterfly Head Chef—San Francisco Chronicle Top 6 Rising Star Chefs Article

When Robert Lam was studying the culinary arts in New York, he was not afraid to push the boundaries. In fact, he was kicked out of a class on Asian cooking for disagreeing with the simplistic approach of the teacher! Today, Lam calls his unique style of cooking Asian within Asian, and draws from Vietnamese, Thai, Chinese, Japanese and Korean traditions. He finds a way to stay close to his roots and what he calls the true flavors, he learned in his mother's kitchen, while never losing that spirit of adventure that created waves back at the culinary institute. Come see for yourself why food critic Michael Bauer calls Lam "a serious cook, whose dishes speak eloquently of his talent."

When Lam's family moved to Southern California from Saigon in the mid 1970's, his mother opened up a Vietnamese restaurant that made quite an impression on four-year-old Robert. Years later, his passion for cooking was still so strong that he tried to drop out of college to pursue his culinary interests full time. His parents made him a deal if he graduated, he could attend the Culinary Institute of America. After earning a degree from the University of San Francisco, he was off to New York to follow his dream of becoming a chef. It was certainly the right decision, as Lam has earned high praise for his skills at Brannan's Grill in Calistoga, and now at Butterfly Restaurant in San Francisco. The San Francisco Chronicle took notice of Robert's special abilities, naming him to their list of six Rising Star Chefs—a designation reserved for chefs they predict will soon be stars on the national stage.

"Chef-owner Rob Lam is a serious cook, his Asian-inspired menu appeals to a celebratory crowd, and Butterfly has become a prime spot for larger gatherings." –Michael Bauer, San Francisco Chronicle
